

My theory on relative spiritual polarization in these end times:

How do you tell people that they'll end up hell if they don't start showing any respect or love to the One who has the power to send them there?

You start gently, then more cautiously, then more sternly, then more urgently, then more alarmingly, then you even outright tell them that they'll end up in hell if they don't start showing any respect or love to the One who has the power to send them there! After that, they're on their own. Its simple. (Well, except for the ironic part where you love them so much that you find it near impossible to stop at just those few tries, where eventually your desperation to spare them this end, causes them to hate you as much as you loved them.)

or...

I am convinced that the more you love the unsaved and want to save them from death, the more they proportionally will hate you and want to kill you.

Thus the short version of how our [untamed] loving of those who love self causes and amplifies an opposing spiritual polarity, and ergo the reason why the Bible then tells us to stop trying before they get that angry.
